THE CHINESE BILL.

The Early Budd Catches the Worm Much to the Surprise of Everybody.

WASHINGTON, April 23.—Speaker Hereafter the house of representatives has but every day at ten o'clock, but yesterday at the instance of Morrison the hour for assembly was by resolution fixed at 11 o'clock. The result was that when the House met there were long hardly fifty members present. Two or three members of the committee on rules were also absent, and there was considerable confusion as to the order of business. Randall moved to take up the bill to refund to the states the direct tax collected during the war of the rebellion, but Morrison objected, and the Chinese bill was taken up. Morrison moved to strike out the enacting clause, and Geddes moved to amend by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting a substitute for the bill. Geddes' substitute provides that the president may, whenever he deems it necessary, suspend the coming of Chinese laborers to the United States, and when he does so he shall issue his proclamation to that effect, and thereafter it shall be unlawful for any Chinese laborer to come to the United States. Any Chinese laborer who shall come to the United States in violation of the provisions of this act shall be liable to a fine of not more than $500 and to imprisonment for not more than one year, and may be arrested upon the warrant of any justice, judge or commissioner of the United States, and upon conviction may be adjudged to pay the fine and imprisonment, and in default of payment may be removed from the United States to the country from which he came. Geddes' substitute was adopted—yeas 155, nays 72. Morrison's motion to strike out the enacting clause was then voted down—yeas 72, nays 155. Geddes' substitute was then adopted as the bill, and the house adjourned.

Concerning the Cattle Plague

TOLEDA, April 21.—The great cattle market was arrived to-day from the east. All of the cattle coming to Toledo will be held in state quarantine for ninety days. A telegram to the board of health from Chicago says that the disease was sent to Indy by the government, but Commissioner Murphy says the disease was brought by the cattle from Holland.

Holland asked of our Chinese day was received to consider the bill and adjourn, much time was required by which it was passed. Holman was called to the chair, and Holman resumed the floor, and the bill was passed by the committee on foreign affairs was set to this seat for the first time in the session. Holman was followed by Randall, who said the great object of legislation was to make the Democratic party victorious at the next election. Randall's remarks were in favor of the bill, and he was followed by Reed, who opposed it. Reed's speech was a very able one, and was frequently applauded. Reed was followed by Hiscock, who spoke in favor of the bill. Hiscock was followed by Frye, who opposed it. Frye

PRESIDENTIAL POSSIBILITIES.

Upon whom will the republican nomination for the presidency fall? For democrats as well as for republicans this is now the great question, since there is a conviction in the minds of not a few democrats that if the republican convention shall make a wise selection the candidate will be successful. Such considerations as are careful and candid men can observe, or are certain to reflect upon the personal fitness of a republican standard-bearer, should be independent votes of the country, and especially of New York, at the same time encouraging the full regular party vote, but would not be the smallest doubt of the outcome. And such a candidate could easily be named. Any one of a dozen or twenty whose names might be offered would in every essential contest of success.

So far the candidates mentioned are chiefly three, namely, Blaine, Arthur, Sherman. Edmunds, Logan and Lincoln. Of these Blaine has the largest unmixed following, but many of them say of the others he appears to lack in personal support must be fatal to success. He is a strong and shrewd, but the leaders of the party are not the strongest" and "safest" party. Sherman could get the support of the independent vote, but he could not get the democratic vote, and this vote so heavy as in New York and New York is the pivotal state of the election.

There are several reasons why the votes of Blaine referred to are disinclined to support Mr. Blaine. One of them rests on the fact that he is known in relation to the important question of civil service, is not satisfactory to them. They class him with those whose motto is, "to the victors belong the spoils." They allege, in power, that he has a large proportion of the elements of a demagogue in his nature and make up, and point to acts and incidents in his political career to sustain the assertion. Again, they say that his foreign policy, while secretary of state, was fraught with danger to the country, and fear that if he should be president the country might be forced into needless complications with foreign nations, or get into a position from which it would be compelled to back down with humiliation. These, too, with many the recollection of the record made by publication of the "Mulligan letters" will not do with.

To Mr. Blaine there is wanting still another element of strength; and this, too, unfortunately, is most significant in the empire state. It is the support of the so called stalwart faction. For Arthur or the stalwarts Blaine has no love; and their estrangement from him is quite as marked. Twice they have snatched from him a nomination that long temptingly near. Twice have he and his supporters foiled them in their purpose. Hence it is well said that his name is a storm center for all opposition."

An acute observer writes from Washington: "He has no real hope of success. The Keystone of Pennsylvania, Ohio and the northwest is not the harrah of triumph. It is only the gathering summons of the anti-Arthur rank. Blaine is a rallying cry for the moment. That is the secret. Blaine knows it; he appreciates that bitter antagonism and a definite distrust in many quarters have ruined his ambition. But he, too, has his resentments, and one of them is that Arthur shall be retired. Arthur sees him to the seat; he will reciprocate. Perhaps with another man from the west nominated by his influence, he might again be made secretary of state. That is his hope; to control strength enough to name the winner, and under that obligation to secure the post which he received from his rival." Blaine's relation to the republican party could not be stated more clearly or truthfully by any combination of words. Passing from acute criticism to the person of president, the writer adds: "The Blaine men will hold the balance of power at Chicago."

Edmunds is much spoken of, but admirable as he would be in many respects as a candidate the chances of his nomination are small. The reasons for the want of harmonious feeling between Edmunds and his supporters, and Blaine's great strength in the convention. Edmunds is not the kind of man to whom the body of Blaine's adherents would naturally go. To quote again from the writer above referred to: "Edmunds is gifted with the characteristics of cooler and ideal executive and versed in statesmanship beyond any man in public life; yet there are two obstacles, Blaine, all I the fear that he would be but a cold, distant figure to plate before the people." Blaine regards Edmunds as a stalwart, and no man in the support of stalwartism can receive the strength he contributes. "By nature the two men clash. He remembers that in 1880 Edmunds carried three-fifths of New England, and was known to be in the Grant interest. More than any one else, he knows that, with Edmunds president, Blaine would be ignored as much as now."

There would be less antagonism between Blaine and Sherman; but Sherman, though able and safe, and commanding the respect of the country, never will have in a national convention any really earnest and enthusiastic support. The people trust him, but politicians do not "swarm" towards him. Logan is a man of another sort. He has an open, frank and generous nature, and has made no enemies. His energy, earnestness and unflinching courage as a soldier have always been admired. The Blaine men, if they cannot nominate their own candidate, would go to Logan or to Lincoln much more readily than to Edmunds or to Sherman; and on the other hand many of the supporters of Edmunds, and perhaps of Arthur, would go more naturally to Logan or to Lincoln than to Blaine. Upon one contingency, however, the latter may be nominated; and that is the possible event of a stampede for him on the part of delegates from the southern states. These delegates will be largely for Arthur. But their desire to go for a winning man may carry them off their feet and carry in the contest. Should they add their strength to the heavy Blaine delegations from Pennsylvania and other parts of the north the man of Maine would be nominated with a rush. Still, it is most probable that the several delegations will be held off by their leaders, so that no concentration will be possible till after a contest; and then the final result will be decided by circumstances that no one can foresee in advance of the consummation. Out of this situation the convention may get a man that has not thought of as a possibility. Should it be General Grant there are some who would not be surprised. After a long contest of the fact one in convention the mention of his name might be taken up with enthusiasm and carry all before it.

A correspondent shows the folly of the democratic declaration against the contract system for prison labor. What the people want is a system which will compel the convicts to earn their own living, instead of being supported by the honest labor of the state. It is only under the contract system that prison labor can as yet be made available in Oregon. Under that system, but in no other way, the convicts may be made to earn something towards their own support. Demagogues who make platforms don't speak always for people of common sense.

The country wants to hear no more about taxing off the whisky or tobacco taxes. The tobacco, whisky and beer taxes are purely excise taxes. In any proper and thorough scheme of tax reform, such as the Carlisle Morrison democrats are committed to, these taxes must be retained, because the revenue they bring comes not from the necessaries of life, but from luxuries, and takes no money from the consumer except that which goes into the treasury. They are the best examples of taxes for revenue only."

Sheriff Sears is said to feel badly. Probably he feels as if he had been dealt with as roughly as he dealt with Sheriff Bushtel two years ago.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

We have recently seen a rare and curious book, entitled the "History of Advertising from the Earliest Times," illustrated by accordingly numerous specimens and biographical notes. Advertisements tell their own story. They give an inside into the life of the people among whom they are published, as the extracts we have made from this interesting book will show. A season, in the Tatler said: "In my vacation, as a dearth of news, to entertain myself with those collections of advertisements that appear at the end of public papers. These I look upon as the most genuine history of the world, in the same manner that the freshest parts of the paper are those I like best. In the we hear that a notorious prevaricator in the republic city, in the corner we have of a gentleman who has shut up shop and run away."

Advertising is of very ancient origin. Rome overspread and shone with handbills for sale and placards of advertisers' goods for sale and placards calling to the notice of passers-by, the lost, the found, the sold, the bought. Traces of advertising were practiced in the early days of the English as far back as ancient Greece. A torch was the sign of a tavern in Rome, whence arose the proverb, "Good wine needs a bush." On the walls of Pompeii various advertisements have been discovered. At the funeral festivities certain lights the company with their presence and with table games, the shedding of wine, and perfumed sprinkling and waving the leaves off the sun." During the middle ages, while civil strife was at a low ebb and competition there was very trifling, signs were required. An object type also the trade sign, such as a hat for the barber and a boot for the cobbler. As luxury increased and the number of books reading in the people, its multiplied, nonetheless was resorted to, and as reading was a scarce accomplishment, personal advertising was most common. This is fine everything that could attract a man's was attempted, from the elephant to the snail. Election in the animal kingdom, and from the collar to the daisy in the vegetable world.

Another ancient form of advertising was by public cries. This was very common in the middle ages, when education was at so great a discount that it was regarded as a mark of effeminacy for any knight or noble to be able to read or write. As early as the thirteenth century public criers were a well organized body in France, and special privileges were granted them. Their principal duty seems to have been to cry wine, from which it was easy to infer the sale of this commodity was the loudest among the criers. In England criers appear at an early period and were sworn to perform their duty well. Besides crying all sorts of goods they proclaimed the cause of the condemnation of criminals, and made proclamations of all kinds except such as concerned ecclesiastical matters, which were exclusively the province of the sacred bishops. They need hours which were provided for them by the mayors of London towns.

With the improvements in printing and the invention of movable type, pamphlets and newspapers the first rude forerunners of our Papers were used by the bold spirits of those days who had the sagacity to understand the advantages of a system of intercommunication between buyer and seller. Local special advertisements appear at the end of parish papers. These I once drew are extracts of news from the world, in the same manner that the foreign papers of the paper are taken from the We hear that a notorious prevaricator in the republic city, in the corner we have of a gentleman who has shut up shop and run away."

It sounds of southern Kansas have added a petition to congress praying that the Indian Board of Co. Peters may be removed to their old stamping ground in northern Idaho. The petitioners say that the Indians are very peaceable and that if they were removed they will soon become extinct. We fear it would not encourage foreign capitalists to put their money in northern Idaho. But if we can get rid of the Indians we might not be sorry to see them go.

The Albany (N. Y.) Journal says: "The democratic party has not a monopoly of the dishonesty in this state will encourage the belief in the party in this state will encourage the belief in the minds of those dishonest. To conduct the state unquestionably the support of Mr. Arthur as of Mr. Blaine, with the certainty that the state will be carried by the democrats if it is by the direction of New York, is to invite a contest on this state, the result of which republicans, who put the success of the party before the success of any candidate, cannot look forward with equanimity."

In the issue Mr. Tilden as a presidential candidate says that "that mind is right, but his supporters for such a step and his special purpose are not right." Now, we must look how he would put this into practice. Would he have the democratic party in this state withdraw its support of Mr. Cleveland, and thus defeat the election of Governor Cleveland? The first effect would be to defeat the democratic party in this state, and perhaps at least that would be the result. Would he have the democratic party in this state withdraw its support of Mr. Cleveland, and thus defeat the election of Governor Cleveland? The first effect would be to defeat the democratic party in this state, and perhaps at least that would be the result.

To secure a practicable administration of the water department of the city, a change was necessary. It is good to at the moment to propose to repeal the ordinance providing for the water commissioners.

The Oregonian

THURSDAY MORNING APRIL 21 1864

NOTES FROM NEW YORK.

[CORRESPONDENCE OF THE OREGONIAN

NEW YORK April 1

Robert Harris president of the Overland Pacific railroad received a salary of 50 dollars per month and supervision when he was elected to the position. That he was a compromise candidate is well known and he came in on the place very much against the wishes of Ben Holladay and others interested in the Overland mail and stage line. Mr Harris did not want the place and only accepted it after Ben Holladay had agreed to pay him a salary of 10000 a year. Mr Harris was a poor man when he took the position and he has made a handsome fortune since. He is a thorough gentleman and a first class railroad man. He graduated from the Sylvania Company which has served him better than any other railroad company in the United States but has never been connected with the Overland service.

CHEAP PAPER.

A few days ago I had a long conversation with a gentleman well informed on North Carolina affairs and he says that the Harris party in that state is stronger now than ever before. He says that Governor Vance is not popular with the people and that Harris will be the next governor. Vance is a secessionist and Harris is a Union man. The latter is a Democrat and was a delegate to the Baltimore convention which nominated Lincoln and Johnson. He says that Governor Vance has been a failure and that Harris will be elected by a large majority.

Mr Harris was born in Vermont and is about 50 years of age. He is a fine looking man and is a good speaker. He
